Is unemployment here to stay?

Although it is not yet winter, the cold is already making its way into the lives of the homeless. Many are sleeping outdoors, and some are using blankets to keep warm.

The recession's over, but several hundred thousand Canadians—from free-loading frauds to serious distress cases—are drawing unemployment insurance. What's more, says Maclean's Ottawa editor, nobody is likely to do much about it. Here's why.

In the cold months ahead, many of the homeless will be sleeping outdoors. Some will use blankets to keep warm, but many will not.

Now that the worst Canadian oil slump is over, when the economy is over?

As early as late February it became clear that recovery is well established. Industrial production in Canada reached a new high after two years of decline. But then came the oil shock. The 1980 forecast predicts that the gross domestic product will be 1.5 per cent below 1979. Financing provided in his budget speech, and he predicted an oil shock would be a major high inflation rate and a loss of high money but also a period of new expansion.

All the figures look good—except unemployment. In June 1980 11.4 million were still without jobs and looking for work, 11.7 per cent of the labor force. This was well below the 12.4 million or 12.2 per cent in the depressed summer of 1978 but explained explains in the National Employment Survey noted 229,000. The industrial production index is up by nearly one-third since the 1979 low but the employment index is up barely a quarter. And even if unemployment goes down to normal for the first time since 1975, the government's commitment to pay another high peak of seasonal unemployment next winter perhaps allows it to high as far.

They believe unemployment is here to stay. The oil shock is the disaster level of 1975 which gave the Canadian economy had no job. But even if recovery leads to have lower unemployment than they think that is good news or bad we shall have more unemployment than we've had since the 1970s, and enough to make it a serious national problem.

There is one horizon year ago the 1979 would have been difficult but fairly simple—to make jobs. Look Rogers' theory of the over-cycled budget, continued on page 36.

She's making the test we count on...

Home from the store with the week's supplies. "Good!" She'll say. But at least she'll have room for another score today. You open the door of your Frigidaire refrigerator and start packing the food and groceries away. Without thinking more about it you're making the most crucial quality control test of a product... the satisfaction-survey. For the fact that you can take the efficiency of your Frigidaire for granted is a sign that General Motors people have successfully engineered another top-quality product. Throughout the four GM manufacturing companies in Canada, specialists and scientists derive exhaustive controls and tests to guarantee high quality (some of these tests are shown on these pages). Every means is employed to make every component of every GM product—cars and trucks, Diesel locomotives, Frigidaire appliances, engines—as near perfect as modern science can make it. And a constant interchange of ideas assures that every company benefits from the research of the others. But the final and most crucial test of our achievement must always be your enjoyment of the finished product. This is the one test we cannot perform... yet it's the one we can count on most.

For in the long run, it is only the wide acceptance of our products by millions of people at 4 cents that gives meaning to it. So proving the quality control test you perform each day that proves our own quality control at General Motors.

At the GM Assembly Plant at Delmore it never rains unless it pours! In a special water-tight booth a precision, automatic disassembler parts down six finished GM cars. For four minutes or more the cars are disassembled under careful observation to ensure that they are correctly sealed and completely waterproofed against even the very worst conditions you might meet on the school highway!

Frequent inspections of every electric range at the Frigidaire Plant in Scarborough make sure that every one is completely flawless when it leaves the line. Throughout manufacturing—from the raw materials stage to the final inspection check—optical instruments and the experienced eyes of experts ensure each appliance against the highest standards of GM quality. Only the highest quality product reaches your home!

Microscopic examination is but one phase of the exhaustive analyses to which raw materials and sub-assembled parts from the line are subjected in the laboratories at St. Catharines before they enter St. Catharines. By contrast, careful checking at every stage of production, the slightest defects that might mar quality perfection are avoided, only the specified high quality materials reach the line, only the top quality results leave it.
